Board Reviews: Abort, retry, ignore, fail - a new model is needed

The structure of organisational leadership is conceived as being two dimensional. That is, there are two teams, the board and an executive, operating independently of one another, yet residing within the same organisation. I propose that organisational leadership is, in fact, three-dimensional. That is, there are not two, but three teams that make-up the trinity of leadership: the board and executive, the traditional two-dimensional theory and the 'third team.'

This team is the most powerful team within the trinity of leadership of an organisation. The third team is formed whenever the board and executive collaborate or meet in formal or informal settings.

If we can accept that the combined board and executive, are the Team with the most influence over, and impact on organisational performance. Then shouldn't we also accept, that understanding how the board and executive function as a team is imperative to enhancing organisational performance?
